ZOE FOSTER
Author,
Air Kisses

Your favourite gizmo?

My MacBook Air. It's slim and sexy and weighs roughly as much as an origami crane. It facilitates my writing novels, blogging and looking up the spelling of "origami" on Google.

So, you're a Mac fan?

Yes, the brand "arrogant" people use. PC people would say that. They're jealous because we're better than them. My MacBook Air is only weeks old. It's less a tool for writing things, communicating or research, and more a shiny, cyborg-esque growth on my fingertips. I'm still letting go of my old iBook. It's hard, you know? We've shared some great stories, some incredible Facebooking and some breathtaking coffee spills.

Check your emails often?

I check my email the way a woman expecting a call from A Guy Who Said He'd Call checks her mobile phone: with inexcusable, embarrassing and obsessive frequency.

Favourite websites?

Well, obviously primped.com.au, which is pretty much the best and most excellent beauty destination on the web, ever. But also NYmag, Jezebel, The Onion and Copyranter.

How many hours a week or day spent online?

Maybe two to three. I know that as

I'm booking in to have a titanium hip fitted in my eighties, I'll think back on this answer and think, so that's where my twenties went.

Your blog?

Fruitybeauty.com.au. I started this while working at Cosmo because I had an excess of information about eye shadow and self-tanners and de-puffing, smoothing, circulation-boosting eye gels that couldn't fit into the mag.

Last words on your relationship with technology?

We're pretty tight. We tussle occasionally, but mostly we hang out and drink smoothies and talk about whether banana or mango is the superior beverage enhancer.
